Mini-me playing the king of the hill again? How self-centered are you exactly? Entitled to drive your monster truck over the heads of others. What matters is your sovereign belly-button. That's the center of gravity for the universe.

You can snap out of the gravity well of your identity blueprints you know. Take a broader perspective. Consider the collective of all beings. As important as you are. None that you may kick aside in your favor. Don't be selfish jerk.

Driving in that self-tunnel again, are you? Nothing else matters. If it fits your tunnel – you engage. If it doesn't – you ignore. And if it bothers your tunnel, you throw a negative reaction.

Have you ever thought of switching from that egocentric tunnel into a geocentric broader view of the world? A view of the world where you are in no way superior to others. Where beings are equal and their needs are of equal importance.

If you expect attention, you give attention. If you expect favors, you do favors in equal or greater measure. Don't be a black hole in the center of your universe. Your belly button is not that precious. It's filled with the same old fluff and shit as the belly button of the other person. Why should yours reign supreme?

If everything is ever centered in your self and governed by your tunnel, it only leads to collisions, conflicts, degradation, erosion of a shared field of living. Please, try and snap out of it for a reflective moment. Place yourself in the mirror of others.

How is it that you're entitled to drive your monster truck in a tunnel over the heads of every other being in existence? Boggles the mind, but then again, such is life in the prison, shackled by the blueprint of your self-conception. Playing the little kingpin in your significantly narrow universe.

Please, revise that sense of self-importance. Consider yourself in integration with the collective, where all beings coexist, adapt to each other, accommodate each other's needs. Where none is so entitled as to dominate or sideline others – just because they feel like it in their claustrophobic self-importance.

Mini-me is the king of the hill – a rooster crowing on the shit pile. That is the way you are – when you behave as the center of the universe. Please, snap out of it, crack your shell, open your eyes to a broader universe.

Did you snap out of that egotic little shell yet? Or still caught up in the gravity well of your identity blueprints? If you want to snap out of it, stop being a basket case, experience a broader spectrum of reality. We have medicines. Plenty of surgical snaps on the channel. Also points to the point on a friendlier note. Have a see, subscribe, view the playlists. Snap snap. Step by step. Weaning you from the mini-me.
