How scattered it all is. All those worthy bits and pieces. Random piles without true rhyme and reason, tethered together with tunnels of fractured desire. If we ever hope to become whole again, we must recognize, recollect, reorganize the contents of our lives. Witness the whole of what we are – as it is – weaving our loom with threads of uncoated truth.

Witness the world, drowning in its scatter piles.

Random compilations brought together by tethers of biased desire. So much merit and potential in there. None of it manifest, because it's all so scattered.

Like a move pile, a hundred boxes hastily put together. Kind of related. Some of it even labeled. Yet all of it without an overarching rhyme and reason. It all needs to be unpacked, reorganized, consolidated, made function true to its purpose.

Such are the contents of our lives. Such are the contents of our civilization as a whole. Not a coherent mansion of consciousness. Instead, like an old shed, serving multiple purposes, its contents unclear. Yet there too we must reach, past our shady membranes, to uncover all that is.

All of it brought into clear daylight, recognized as it is. And then integrated. From idle watering cans, made to be filled with the stream of living waters, for watering our inner garden. To a thousand tools of transformation you forgot that you even had.

In here, we often play with metaphors to bring you accessible ladders for your conscious evolution. The world is rich with a million symbols. Any one of them you look at, it will point you in the right direction. Yes, into that flash of undivided consciousness, where the creator emerges, where the witness reposes.

Then friends, reflect on the essence of your lives. Find the true tethers. Bridge it all together. Reintegrate awareness back into the tree of life. Each and every casual little thing in your life. Witness it for what it is, free of desire and projection.

That is the way of casual watchers. A way back to clarity. A way back to reality. A way into the fullness of all that you are. It will only ever converge when all of your contents have been duly sorted and organized. Then weave back together the scattered loom of your life. Major threads, minor threads, with their respective priorities.

Like pieces in a puzzle. The more of them that find their slots, the more the rhyme and reason unfolds. The more you witness of the big picture, of the umbrella of all that is, the stronger the pull of your conscious singularity becomes. Then keep your mirror clear and keep on weaving the great work of your life.
