We'll tackle the biggest of the questions first off. What is love? And does it even exist? We have the crazy little thing called love. The chemical drive, attraction and bonding, the type of love that people usually fall into. Falling in love.

Then we have loftier concepts like selfless love and universal love that tend to work better when directed to God, imaginary or otherwise, or into other dimensions – and result in significant letdowns and disappointments, when directed towards fundamentally broken human beings.

And what of soulmates, your cosmic counterparts? Is there one pinned for you somewhere out there that you should be looking for? Well, by the looks of it, the basic principle is: We have two pieces of a cosmic puzzle with just enough similarity and complementarity to enable a certain magnetic attraction. Of varying grades of compatibility, but in principle, love follows.

But is it eternal, can it be forever? Even for the time being, long term? When the fact is that this love is constructed atop a foundation of constantly moving and evolving parts?

There's bonding on the plane of our instincts, lust, propagation of our species. Then we have emotional coupling, the exchange agreement for mutual feel-goods. The more cognitively oriented like to bond over parallel thought formations, frameworks of thinking. And of course, we have the like meets like, matching identities, where the roles we have assumed are parallel, and therefore we find synergy and a bond between us.

In so many combinations of the different planes of our existence and awareness, all of those in perpetual change. How can love last, when its components are ever transforming? Should we just freeze ourselves and the flux of time to make true love eternal? And plenty more questions are brewing in the basin where all of that came from.

Let's try and pin it down into something perhaps answerable. Then the questions for you. 1. What is love? 2. Is there true and selfless love? 3. And how can love ever last in a changing world made of broken individuals? – What say you? Please drop your answers down below there, and remember, there are no bad answers. There are only answers that are given – and that are not. Give your answers – broaden the perspectives we share.
